To Whom It May Concern:

Our CPA firm hired Axxon Technologies and, in particular, Ron Boetger, to handle our computer technology issues. The duties included set up of a new office, creating a network, ability to access the server from other locations, safety requirements, general training, and many other miscellaneous issues that only a computer system can generate.

Let me first say, as owner of the Company, I am technically challenged. Mr. Boetger handled his duties with a down-to-earth style that allowed even me to understand the general concepts he was implementing. Naturally, there were bugs in the system. Ron responded, day or night, weekday or weekend, to our constant calls. Eventually, the system and its interaction settled down.

Ron is still our computer consultant. Now, the only time we call is when we ourselves mess something up. He still responds quickly and patiently walks us through our error for the umpteenth time.

As a business owner, I am most concerned about cost and responsiveness. He excels in responding to our cries for help. His invoices have been very reasonable. I cannot judge his technical knowledge, but I do know he has our system performing well, is not afraid to admit he is unsure of an issue and will relentlessly pursue the answer to his satisfaction.

Do not be fooled by Ron's country-boy demeanor. If he accepts you as a client, he will treat your system as his own, share the frustrations with you that any system brings, and will resolve problems through his diligence. I highly recommend Axxon Technologies and am very satisfied with my choice for our computer consulting firm.

Sincerely,

Douglas L. Heiser, CPA
